

APPENDIX C QUALITY OF LIFE

The following chapter outlines a context with regard to that way rural communities operate from a socialization point of view. It is why we have placed these report findings under Quality of Life. The rest of the chapter outlines a variety of organizations within the Elizabethtown-Kitley township that are related to Quality of Life factors such as water activities, cultural events, etc.

"Social engagement and civic participation: Are rural and small town populations really at an advantage?"

Rural and Small Town Canada Analysis Bulletin Catalogue no. 21-006-XIE, Vol. 6, No. 4 (June 2005). Appendix XX - noted references / page numbers are found in that report.

HIGHLIGHTS

- Rural residents are more likely to know all or most of their neighbours and rural residents are more likely to trust their neighbours. However, there is little difference between rural and urban residents in the degree to which they provide help to a neighbour or receive help from a neighbour.
- Rural residents are more likely to provide unpaid volunteer work for an organization but rural residents are no more likely than urban residents to give unpaid help to people that they know (like relatives, neighbours or friends).
- Rural residents are more likely to have a strong sense of belonging to their local community.
- However, there is no difference between rural and urban residents in terms of the degree of social isolation from friends or relatives, the level of political involvement and the levels of trust toward other people.

This bulletin uses General Social Survey (GSS), cycle 17 data (Appendix XX) to examine various aspects of social engagement, social cohesion and social participation. It assesses whether residents of rural and small town areas are more likely than residents of larger urban centres to be involved in organizations; to establish and maintain social relationships with friends, relatives and neighbours; to volunteer; to be involved in various social and political activities; and to express trust toward other people.

While there are many discussions around the concept of social capital, one way of describing it in a concise manner is to say that "social capital consists of networks of social relations which are characterized by norms of trust and reciprocity" (Stone, 2001). There have been two main reasons for this heightened interest in social capital and social engagement in recent years. First, individuals who are more socially engaged, and communities where social engagement is greater, are perceived to do better on several dimensions (health, economic success, general well-being, etc.). Secondly, social engagement and social capital have been portrayed as declining significantly in the past decades (e.g. Putnam, 2000), which motivated reflections on the causes of this decline and on possible solutions to reverse the trend. One of the factors identified to explain the decline of social engagement has been the rising urbanization of the population. Within this context, this article asks: are rural areas and small towns characterized by a higher level of social engagement and participation than larger urban centre? (page 3)

Social relationships with relatives

Findings are consistent, and they indicate that residents of larger places are not more likely to be estranged or isolated from their relatives than others. (page 4) To summarize, rural residents were not more or less likely to be isolated from their family than urban residents they felt close to. However, rural residents were more likely to see their relatives very frequently (a few times a week or every day) than individuals who lived in larger urban centres. (page 5)

Social Relationships with neighbours

The more rural a place, the greater the proportion of individuals who said they knew all or most of their neighbours. They were also more likely to say that they trusted most people in their neighbourhood. (page 6) Thus, rural populations are at an advantage with respect to neighbourliness, but not by as much as might be expected. (page 8) rural residents were reported to be more likely to help with child care in their neighbourhood.

Volunteering activities

In 2003, approximately 34 percent of all Canadians said that they did unpaid volunteer work for any organization. There was a clear and strong association between place of residence and volunteering. The more rural the place of residence, the greater was the likelihood of having volunteered in the past 12 months. These differences remained significant when other factors, such as age, gender, household income, level of education, length of residence in the neighbourhood, place of birth, province of residence and marital status, were taken into account. In other words, it is not because residents of more rural areas are different in their socioeconomic characteristics that they were more likely to be involved in volunteering activities. (page 12).

Participation in voluntary organizations

The largest differences between urban and rural residents in membership were observed in service clubs or fraternal organizations (five percent in the largest CMAs versus twelve percent in both strong/moderate MIZ and weak/no MIZ). In order to verify if rural residents were proportionally more likely to be members of any organizations, the proportion of individuals who were members of at least one of the seven organizations mentioned in the GSS questionnaire was estimated. Residents of Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver and Ottawa-Gatineau were less likely to be members or participants in at least one organization than residents of other areas (52 percent versus 57 percent of residents of weak/no MIZ) (Figure 9). However, the proportion of individuals living in CMAs of 500,000 to 1 million who were involved in a least one organization was not different from the proportion observed in more rural areas. The differences between the largest urban areas and rural places were less than the differences previously reported in the United States (page 13 and 14).

Political participation

The involvement of citizens in the political process is considered by many political scientists to be a central element of a healthy democracy (Verba, Scholzman and Brady, 1995). Attendance at public meetings on local affairs has been shown, at least in research in the United States, to be more frequent in rural areas and small towns than in large cities (Putnam, 2000; Oliver, 2000). There is also evidence to support this observation in Canada. According to the 2003 GSS data, the larger the place, the lower was the proportion of individuals who said that they attended a public meeting in the past 12 months. One explanation for this greater attendance of public meetings in smaller places might be that there are greater possibilities of directly influencing the political process in smaller towns; another explanation might be that there is a greater interest in local affairs in smaller communities (Oliver, 2000).(page 14)

SENSE OF BELONGING AND TRUST

Trust

The level of trust within groups or communities is often considered as an important element of "social capital." Many authors argue that there are important positive outcomes for groups and communities in which people trust each other. For example, some research indicates that communities where citizens trust each other have a significant economic advantage (Knack and Keefer, 1997) and even show higher life expectancy rates (Kawachi, Kennedy and Lochner, 1997) along with lower homicide rates (Rosenfeld, Messner and Baumer, 2001).

Respondents were asked:

Generally speaking, would you say that most people can be trusted or that you cannot be too careful in dealing with people?

In summary, the level of trust expressed toward other peoples did not vary greatly along the rural-to-urban gradient. However, as it was shown in the section on social participation, residents of smaller places were significantly more likely to trust their neighbours than were residents of more urban places. (page 16)

Belonging

Residents of smaller places are sometimes said to have stronger sense of belonging toward their local communities than residents of larger places. GSS data provides strong support for that perception. The more urban the place of residence the less likely individuals were to say that they had a very strong sense of belonging to their local community. (page 16)

Conclusions

The greatest differences observed across the rural to-urban gradient related to:

- The proportion of individuals who knew all or most of their neighbours
- The extent to which individuals trusted their neighbours
- The incidence of volunteering
- Participation in a service club or fraternal organization and
- The sense of belonging to the local community.

For these 5 items, the differences between the residents of larger CMAs and residents of smaller places were quite important, and could not be explained by the fact that individuals living in more rural areas had different socio-economic and demographic characteristics than individuals living in more urban areas. In other words, to paraphrase Putnam, residents of rural areas were more engaged "because of where they are, not who they are" (2000:206).
